The informal meeting was dedicated to security challenges in the OSCE area, conflicts, migration, terrorism, protection of human rights and protection of democracy.

“The Russian Federation continues gradual absorption of Georgia’s occupied territories, accompanied with intensive illegal military build-up. This poses direct military threat to Georgia and jeopardizes the regional security environment. Our concerns are further aggravated due to Moscow’s continuous refusal to reciprocate Georgia’s unilateral non-use of force pledge, as well as its decline at the Geneva Discussions to create international security arrangements on the ground”, - stated Minister Janelidze. More: <http://e.gov.ge/AJARM>

They are a part of Georgia, part of the international recognized borders of Georgia or within those borders", - Stoltenberg added.

The NATO Secretary General underlined that the Alliance supports "all efforts to try to find a negotiated peaceful solution to these conflicts" and continues to support Georgia through the NATO-Georgian Joint Training and Evaluation Center (JTEC) and the Substantial NATO-Georgia Package, as well as through modernizing and strengthening the country's "capacity to protect and defend itself." "The Guardian" has published an article about the top three Georgian wines

One of Britain's leading newspapers "The Guardian" has published an article: "Gorgeous wines from Georgia" about the top three Georgian wines chosen by wine journalist David Williams. With a wine tradition that stretches back 8,000 years and more than 500 indigenous grapes to choose from, David Williams has managed to select just three great Georgian wines for you to try, - reads the intro of the article. David Williams's wines of the week were Tbilvino Qvevris, Jakeli Khashmi Saperavi and Pheasant's Tears Saperavi. All three wines come from Georgia's wine region of Kakheti.

"There are some wines I've only started to love after visiting the place they're made. One is sherry, which made so much more sense once I'd had a glass of chilled manzanilla with a plate of jmon in a bar in Sanlcar de Barrameda. But there are other wines, from places I've never been, that give me a bad case of wanderlust", - wrote Williams. "Georgian wines always have that effect on me. They're so different, so much their own thing, I start thinking, what sort of place makes wines like this?" - he added. More: <http://e.gov.ge/xUGDV>
